

CULTURED

By Julie Halperin and Sophie Lee
August 26, 2024

Here Are the 12 Must-See Gallery Shows Coming to New York This Fall

When the art world goes back to school, galleries put their best foot forward. Here are CULTURED's picks of the shows you won't want to miss in New York.

Suzanne Jackson, 9, Billie, Mingus, Monk's, 2003. Photography by David Kaminsky. Image courtesy of the artist and Ortuzar Projects.

“Suzanne Jackson”

Where: Ortuzar Projects, 5 White Street

When: September 12–October 19

Why It's Worth a Look: The octogenarian artist Suzanne Jackson was one of the brightest stars of this year's Whitney Biennial. This show will offer new fans a deeper look at her four-decade-long love affair with paper, bringing together early drawings, mid-2000s sculptural works, and recent “environmental abstractions,” which suspend shredded mail and other papers in acrylic paint. Often presented hanging from the ceiling, they look like a cross between a melted painting and a sculptural curtain—and they are unforgettable.

Know Before You Go: In addition to her work as an artist, Jackson was also an influential art dealer: from 1969 to 1970, she ran Gallery 32 in Los Angeles. With a short lifespan and a long tail, the loft gallery space showed the work of now-famous peers including David Hammons, Betye Saar, and Senga Nengudi.